

EDITORIAL

It is with great pleasure that I introduce another edition of the Journal of the Trinidad Field Naturalists' Club. In small associations of this kind it is always difficult to persuade people to transmit their fieldwork to the printed page, and this edition includes the work of some who have not published before. We hope that their example will encourage the others.

This edition is dedicated to the memory of Ludolf Wehekind, who died on 8th October, 1964, a staunch member of the Club and a gentleman, who set a fine example for field naturalists to follow.

During 1964 the Club undertook two major outings to Monos Island in the Bocas, and a small but enthusiastic band carried out field-work of a kind that we would like to see more commonly done in Trinidad. Most of this edition of the Journal is devoted to the publication of this work; we hope to see the Club extend this activity in the near future to the other islands of the Bocas, an area of very considerable biological interest, which has not been adequately studied to date.
